On November 17, the strength and unity of the Santa Clarita Valley was expressed in great numbers at Central Park, where an estimated 10,000 people attended the vigil held for the victims of November 14 and all those affected in the Saugus community. Speaker after speaker spoke of the friends and family who had been lost, the courageous actions of first-responders and teachers that day, and hope for the long road to recovery that lay ahead. Student-body president Andrei Mojica, who spoke on stage that night, describes the “displays of unity” as “humbling, inspiring, but also unsurprising.”

The Saugus High School Wellness Center, located in the multipurpose room, is a new addition to the school’s campus that is designed as “a place, for our students who need support” states Principal Vince Ferry. Implemented into campus life after the events of November 14, the Wellness Center provides a calming area for students to heal

When it comes to the status of recovery, while the people of Santa Clarita have shown a brilliant display of support, the ultimate question stands with how the Saugus students have taken to support their own individual selves during this time. As important it is for the community to move forward, it is equally as, if not more, significant that the Saugus students themselves are taking independent steps to heal.

With time, the world recovers and moves onward. However, as Psychology Today emphasizes, the passing of time through months, or even years, is essentially powerless and unable to heal if the individual does not take the initiative to take the necessary steps forward
